because he could spend much more time to communicate with each child through one-on-one interaction. On the other hand, Tai would also arrange some romantic trips only for his wife and himself.

In 2010, Chenfang wrote an e-mail to Tai to ask him to bring the children to visit the Shanghai World Expo. Tai then took leave from his business and brought Chenfang and Chenrong to visit the Shanghai World Expo and other areas in China for 7 days. Tai took this opportunity to share his opinions with them while travelling in China, as well as to talk to them about finance management, such as how to use money and keep accounts. For instance, Tai told them that using free software and tools, including texting, e-mail, Skype, MSN, QQ, could save a lot of communication expenses.

As for keeping accounts, time, location, item and price should be recorded down in detail. These are the valuable experience that Tai would share with his children anytime and anywhere.

After the trip to Shanghai World Expo ended, Chenfang and Chenrong wrote the report about the trip, which was one of the good habits that Tai encouraged. Speaking of good habits, Tai is a person who will cherish everything. His children once wrote an essay about “My Father.” They wrote, “My father is a person who cherishes resources very much. Anything, including food and appliances, such as toothpaste, body wash or even any other cleaning supplies must be emptied before being replaced. He always asks us to turn off all the lights before leaving a room. While having a meal, we have to finish everything in the bowl. He always set himself as the example. For instance, he would attach leftover soap with the new one, so that he can continue to completely use the old soap. He’s indeed a good father who is thrifty and cherishes the earth’s resources.”

Tai often told his children, “When you grow up, people would praise you for you have a good family education. Therefore, I’m responsible for teaching you to have a good personality and personal philosophy, and I hope you can truly learn from it.”

After Tai's children had completed the report on every trip, Tai would also reward them with cash according to their performance. Each of his children had a piggy bank, and they would save the money in the piggy bank.

The children then opened their piggy banks during Lunar New Year and compared to see who had saved the most.

Tai asks his children to write down the happiest thing they experience every day on the whiteboard, so they could think positively every day and stay optimistic, positive, and have positive values.

Tai always sets himself as an example to encourage his children to learn and grow. He's also a sensitive person. Since his children are growing up, they will have their own life. Tai would then feel lonely. He therefore wrote the "Story of Father and Son" to express his sentiment. Tai also has his whole family take a photo album of pictures every year. He even designs the album in chronological order.
